North" Wakes a Switchman. Time in Virginia has no value whatever, and as it is the universal practice there never to do to-day what can be put off until tomorrow, little inconvenience arises. The railways are run on a happy-ge-'neky schedule, which is extremely diverting to those who have are pressed for minutes, being in a hopeless minority, rather afford occasion for mirch when they begin to kick at Virginia methods. The railway time tables are in perfection in the rural districts. It was decided that the basis of representation, in said Convention, shall be one delegate for every four hundred votes cast for George Hoadley for Governor, in 1883, giving each county the following number of delegates: tricts. Not long ago a night train with a party of New Yorkers on board was bumping along comfortably at a ten-miles-an-hour gait through a remote part of Virginia, when all at once, with tremendous jerk, it came to a standstill. The natives in the sleeping-car did not think it worth while to ask the reason of the sudden stoppage; the aliens did, though, and when the conductor strolled through the car a roar of indignant inquiry went up. The conductor soothingly explained that they always stopped at a switch for fear it might not be set. "But, good gracious," exclaimed an irate New Yorker, "where is the switch-The conductor explained that the particular switchman they then needed was probably asleep. Followed by ob-jurgation, the conductor got off the train, went to the station house, and pounded vigorously, shouting at the "Git up, Jim; the train's here, and a passel of them durned folks from up North is raisin' a breeze 'cause the Jim called back, "I'm a comin'," and evidently turned over and went to sleep again. The Virginians on the train began to chuckle. Their sympathy was entirely with Jim and the conductor. The latter continued to urge Jim, who was always "comin'." but didn't come. The conductor, at first apologetic, being goaded by the New Yorkers, now became pressing.
